cent Laysan albatross were killed along with thousands of chicks, said Barry W. Stieglitz, the project leader for the Hawaiian and Pacific Islands National Wildlife Refuges.

Buried

Many drowned or were buried under debris as waves reaching 5 feet (1.5 meters) high rolled over the low-lying atoll about four hours after the magnitude-9.0 earthquake struck Friday.

The white-and-black feathered Laysan albatross is not in danger of becoming extinct. About one facing means like climate change, a loss of habitat, and invasive species.

"When you start piling the natural catastrophe on top of invasive species invasions and all of these other things, it makes the population a lot less resilient and more susceptible to extinction," he said. "It's rather unfortunate timing, in our eyes. Not that there is ever a good time for this, but there are better times than worse times. And in this era, this is a worse time."

All is well in Marshalls after country's prime minister. The decision was announced following a caucus vote, where a new deputy leader, who will also be the deputy prime minister, was also chosen.

The HRPP's new deputy leader, and Samoa's new deputy prime minister, is the Anoamaa West constituency MP, Fonotoe Nuafesili Pierre Lauofo.

He takes over from Misa Telefoni who did not seek re-election from Falelatai and Samatau.

The ministers who were defeated in yesterday's vote for the deputy leader position were, Flame Naomi Mata'afa, Tuisig-aletaua Sofara Aveau, and Tuu'u Anasi'i Leota.

A source in the HRPP party has also confirmed that the positions of speaker and deputy speaker were also elected at the caucus meeting.
